

Just Transition or How to Make the Transition Acceptable

Finance for Tomorrow

5 November, 11:30 – 13:00

Until now, the social dimension is far from being sufficiently taken into account in investment decisions. Yet, investors as multilateral development banks are key players in financing a transition to net-zero carbon economies and facilitating private investments for a just transition is essential. There are many ways in which they can –and must –contribute to ensuring that this transition is “just”, and that it works towards reducing social and economic inequalities.

Against the background of newly launched “Investors for a Just Transition” coalition by Finance for Tomorrow, this side-event brings the subject of just transition to the international stage, identifies the main areas of engagement and unveils the first academic works allowing new indicators to emerge.
